Dr. Louis Sullivan

I'm Dr. Louis Sullivan, President Emeritus of Morehouse School of Medicine and former US Secretary of Health and Human Services. When I'm at home with my wife, we enjoy relaxing sitting down together, listening to public radio or watching public television.

The broad array of programs on public radio and public television, I think, are interesting and really inform the public. For example, the current debate in Washington about how do we reform our nation's healthcare system—both to see that more people are brought into the system, are able to afford insurance. All of these things are important and so public radio public television are essential to really developing that credibility in the public's mind which, I believe, help open up the world in a way that other forms of broadcast do not.

I'm Dr. Louis Sullivan. Public Broadcasting is my source for news and entertainment that enrich my life.
